We've all heard stories of dead people being raised, Lazarus being the most well-known example. In modern times as well, I met ^{Yohane Wolfram,} a guy, ~~a~~ guy who brought a child back to life by the power of God after she was accidentally ran over by a parent backing out of their driveway.

Modern medicine sees many instances of people "dying" (e.g. flat-lining) then being restored. But because science can usually explain how it worked, somehow the "miraculousness" of it diminishes. I bet if a modern scientist had Lazarus' renewal explained in scientific terms, they would both be impressed and satisfied as to how it happened. But it was still a miracle.

Think of God like a super-advanced doctor, scientist, therapist, coach, etc..

What about animals. Could God bring them back from death?
Of course,

I've never heard of this happening until last Sunday, when a fellow inmate got up in Church and told a story about his family's pet dog that died after probably being hit by a car. It was cold, with rigor mortis setting in. They got together and prayed in gratitude for what a great dog he was. And maybe one or two of them snuck in a "P.S. It sure would be nice if he could come back alive."

When they finished with the prayer, the dog got up, licked them, then joyfully ~~and~~ ran around in a figure 8, as good as new.

I've written a much longer version of this, titled,
"Dog Back From Dead," also dated 11/8/23, posted at
